No matter what your educational system, you can be certain that your education is not the only thing you need to grow to be an educated adult. Education is about you and how you interact with the world around you, but education is also about morality. The four subjects addressed in this section of the AIM blog are Academic Ethics, Interpersonal Skills, Life Skills, and Future Envisionment. Academic Ethics - Ethical and moral reasoning is the foundation for any academic program. You are taught how to make good moral choices in your day to day life. You learn how to understand what is right and what is wrong and how to make good choices when faced with difficult situations. By the time you reach adulthood, you should be able to make these moral choices. Interpersonal Skills - This is the next level of education. The people skills, self-confidence and emotional intelligence you learn in high school can only get you so far. Once you have a job, you need to be able to interact with people. You have to have the knowledge and skills to be able to network and form friendships with people. You also need to know how to deal with people and when to be assertive and when to not be. Life Skills - This is a huge part of education. You can't really learn life skills until you are in the real world. You can learn many of the skills you need to be a successful adult in school, but you will only find out about those skills once you are in the real world. The skills you learn in school can help you solve problems in life, but only after you learn these skills can you use them to solve problems. Future Envisionment - The final subject addressed in the AIM blog. In life, you can always plan ahead for the future. You need to start planning for the future when you are a child. Your goals and dreams need to be set early in life. You can't wait to become an adult and suddenly say, "Hey, I'm a grown up and I need to do these things." You need to start planning for the future when you are a child. If you do not, you will find it hard to make those things happen. Once you reach adulthood, you still need to start planning for the future. If you do not set your goals and dreams, you will find it hard to accomplish those goals.
