Pascucci and Will Dixon play on the same day and they had a line before, "All right, who wants to run it?" after Dixon's run, which was originally a teaser from the first Take Me Out. The King also wore his green pants. "You got a problem with that?" asked Dixon. The King replied, "I got a problem with it when you give me a hundred or a million to run it, but I don't mind running it one-on-one with you, buddy." What's New in This Release: This is a bug fix release for problem of compatibility with specific Gmail. I am trying to write a functional program that consumes an ascii file line by line, which will process each line, check the second field, parse it, and add it to a HashTable. I am having trouble with my HashTable definition. Hashtable is defined as Hashtable table = new Hashtable(); but I am confused as to how to initialize it. I tried But I get an error when I try to call the insert method. I am probably doing this wrong, so any help would be appreciated. Came here to say this. The syntax you are using is wrong. It should be: Hashtable table = new Hashtable(); table.put("foo", "bar"); Because you're initializing a hash table, not a hash map, to be specific. – KennyTMOct 15 '09 at 23:31 2 Answers 2 The constructor is a public no-arg method. You should declare it as public Hashtable(); then when you call it you do: new Hashtable(); Does that make sense? – KennyTM Oct 15 '09 at 23:36 new Hashtable(); returns an instance of a Hashtable You need to define a variable with the same name as the method, in a scope that is accessible to the code that wants to call the method. Here's a slightly better example: public class MyHashTable { public Hashtable MyHashTable() { Hashtable mytable = new Hashtable(); mytable.put("foo", "bar"); return mytable; } } Usage: Hashtable mytable = new MyHashTable(); System.out.println(mytable.get("foo")); new MyHashTable(); is a method to help you make an instance of the class. You need a mytable variable (with the same name) to have a reference to the object that you want to create, and that is not the same reference you get when you simply say new MyHashTable(). (new MyHashTable() would be the same as the MyHashTable class name, which means that new MyHashTable(); is an error
