Although the timing of bone grafting in rhinoplasty is not an arbitrary decision, the procedure must be planned and executed with a balance of aesthetics and practicality in mind. Through a review of current literature and clinical experience, we identify a number of important and commonly practiced guidelines for the timing of bone grafting to prepare for a two-stage rhinoplasty. The procedure is ideally planned in three parts: (1) preoperative, where patient's goals and concerns are addressed and necessary nasal corrective maneuvers are evaluated, (2) intraoperative, when excisional and reconstructive procedures are planned and executed, and (3) postoperative, where nasal measurements and analysis are performed and a final aesthetic result is achieved. The decision to perform a two-stage approach for a rhinoplasty is important to provide patients with adequate length of time for healing and evaluation of the nasal hump and/or deformity prior to nasal projection procedures. In a society where the lives of so many are vastly improved by technology, it's not surprising that the reemergence of deep brain stimulation (DBS) is creating anxiety about how to handle old cases that are left behind. Since 1996, the U.S. Food and Drug Administration (FDA) has approved the use of electrical brain-stimulation devices (DBS) to treat symptoms of Parkinson's disease (PD), such as tremor and slowness of movement. DBS works by electrically stimulating neurons in the brain in a pattern that disrupts PD symptoms. [related] While the FDA has yet to approve these devices for other conditions, several DBS device manufacturers offer implanted stimulators for treating depression, obsessive compulsive disorder, and other serious conditions.
