When to Take a Pregnancy Test For those who are sexually active, there are certain times that we should use a pregnancy test. This is a test that can detect the presence of a developing embryo inside the uterus. Most women don't know that some of the symptoms of pregnancy include a change in normal menstrual periods. But what actually is normal menstrual periods? If you cannot think of anything normal about your period, we highly suggest that you go to the nearest pharmacy and ask for a pregnancy test.

Normal Menstrual Periods
Normal periods are the ones that occur at regular intervals. A normal menstrual period is one that occurs every 21 days. The menstrual periods can be painful, and there can also be some discharge from the vagina. However, if you find your menstrual period to be heavier than usual, then you might have an abnormal period.

Unexplained Soreness in the Abdomen
For those who have a sore abdomen, they should also go to the nearest pharmacy and ask for a pregnancy test. The soreness in the abdomen could be caused by any number of different conditions. The soreness can sometimes be felt when you wake up in the morning. It usually subsides during the course of your day. However, if you feel the soreness throughout your body, that could be the sign that you are pregnant.

Your Nausea
For those who are experiencing nausea, they should try a pregnancy test. You may be experiencing morning sickness. Or you might have been having feelings of discomfort throughout the day. The symptoms of nausea might last for a few days.

The symptoms of nausea usually start once you have conceived, and they normally subside once you have given birth to your baby. There are a lot of other symptoms that are associated with pregnancy. However, these are the main ones that we should be mindful of. Don't be afraid to go to the nearest pharmacy and ask for a pregnancy test. Once you go for a pregnancy test, you can then make an informed decision to proceed further.

Anti-war organizations are accusing the United States, after President Donald Trump's announcement he is bombing Syria, of waging "unilateral" actions that will deny the Syrian government any international legitimacy or support. Journalists at NPR, the UK's BBC, and other media outlets say they have not found any opposition to the war. Trump's announcement sparked widespread condemnation on social media, with hundreds of people tweeting cartoons of the US president firing missiles. Trump's announcement is the latest strike in a long-running conflict in Syria, the focus of which has shifted from Syria to a US-Turkey feud over the latter's strategy to destroy the remnants of the so-called Islamic State (IS). Syrian TV aired footage showing Damascus residents welcoming the targeted airstrikes. This came despite earlier claims by the opposition that the US strike will help them to end the war. Activists from the Syrian Democratic Forces (SDF) said the US strike will only benefit IS, the Kurdish fighters, and the Syrian government. Central Damascus is densely populated with thousands of civilians, making the city an especially dangerous location for Israeli missiles to land, especially
