Postphlebitic syndrome (PPS) is one of the frequent complications following deep vein thrombosis (DVT). We retrospectively studied a group of patients with diagnosed DVT to analyze the incidence of PPS and to analyze the criteria used by physicians to make the diagnosis. All patients with proven DVT admitted to our observation unit between 1989 and 1997 had been asked to complete the Villalta questionnaire to confirm or exclude PPS. The Villalta questionnaire is a reliable tool for detecting PPS (kappa = 0.85, with a positive predictive value of 0.90). The PPS is diagnosed more frequently by the physician than by the patient (85% vs 45%). Among the factors considered in the diagnosis of PPS, isolated pain and a feeling of heaviness are more frequent in patients with a history of DVT. The duration of PPS, however, remains nearly constant. The diagnosis of PPS is frequently made by the physicians on the basis of signs of the disease. In our experience, one-half of the patients with a history of DVT have PPS, confirmed or suspected by the Villalta questionnaire.-5, 2019.
