What's new in MADiSON:

You’re too nice.” Can you find the pattern there? Of course it is, but you have to figure out what it says without the instruction. That’s it in a nutshell. It’s a way of approaching writing, of thinking about it, that is subtle but central to the literary appreciation we’re talking about. EVELYN PROBST WARD: In “The Women Readers Who Read,” we talk a lot about our role models as writers, and some of those are women writers, and some are male writers, but what is your role model in that? LAURA KALDER: I am a reader. Part of it is that I value that so much. I don’t know if I would ever write something if I couldn’t read it myself. I have no interest in copywriting or advertising. I value the narrative over the commercial, so to me it’s the perfect job. EVELYN PROBST WARD: Do you think young writers will ever come to terms with the difference between popular and literature? Do you think that is a part of the job function that you’re trying to explain to people as a librarian? LAURA KALDER: Eventually you’re going to get the writer that doesn’t want to be published, that’s not good for society. That’s where you leave that comfort zone and go and find somebody to talk to about the book and publish it someplace else. I think they will. I think that in some form of media, they already do. I don’t want them to turn their backs on the world of reading because they’ve been taught that books are only for Americans and that they’re boring or they’re for children. ... I am not a literary critic. I am not a journalist. I am a reader. I’m not a professor. I don’t go to a lot of cons—I don’t do that much of that, maybe because I’m so busy. I do go to book signings. I do go to dinners, or I sign books at reading events and book fairs. Without creating a middle ground that appeals to a wider audience, it’s going to be very hard to get rid of the hypocrisy of condescension that comes with
