[Introduction of tetracycline into the blood in patients with kidney infections by antibiotic infusion]. It has been established that minocycline and tetracycline can be introduced into the blood circulating in the bodies of animals and humans. A study was made of the blood-plasma level (by the microbiological method) of minocycline and tetracycline administered to patients at therapeutic serum concentrations. The antibiotic blood levels were studied in 44 patients (tetracycline, 10 mg/kg in 11 cases; minocycline, 4 mg/kg in 11 cases; and minocycline, 5 mg/kg in 22 cases) in whom infections of the kidneys were induced by bladder drainage. The antibiotic blood levels were elevated in the patients who received the doses of tetracycline and minocycline. These levels were close to the minimum inhibitory concentrations (MIC) of the causative agents of the infections. For antibiotic studies of the blood levels in the human organism, the loading dose and the rate of infusion should be taken into account. In this respect, tetracycline and minocycline

Q: Can I use my encrypted dotfile as gitignore file? I have an encrypted dotfile in my project containing password and hostnames of my AWS accounts. Is it possible to somehow use this files as gitignore? For example, if you can't open the file, git works, but when you can open the file, it's not clear how to use it in git. A: Sounds like a fairly robust and complete solution. I'm not sure it's what you want though... Here's a command to keep your config in a.gitignore (git ignore file), and in a new dotfile so you can have both (git hostnames) (taken from here) git config --local.gitignore -t '.dotfile' git config --local.git/config --replace-text "" That will launch terminal and create a config file (.git/config) with all your hostnames. This way, it's clear that this file is just a way for you to have "all your passwords, and your hostnames" in one place. Also, if you want to automate the invocation of such commands you can do this: let g:gitignore_custom='.dotfile' let git_ignore = system('git config --local.gitignore -t '.g:gitignore_custom') if!exists('g:gitignore') let g:gitignore = '' let g:gitignore.= '.dotfile' endif let g:gitignore_custom = substitute(git_ignore, ' ', ', ', 'g') call self.ensure_dotfile(g:gitignore_custom) func! self.ensure_dotfile(gitignore_custom) if exists('g:gitignore_custom') let self.check_if_bad_gitignore_custom = system('git config --local '.g:gitignore_custom.' --has-permissions 2>/dev/null')

Q: Asp.Net: Binding controls to properties within parent object M doing an edit to a question I asked earlier. In the original question, I was having issues getting images to load to from a scope in my application. So I ended up using a little workaround. I put in a function to load the images. To keep things DRY, I created a parent method within the form. public void LoadDocumentDetailsButton_Click(object sender, EventArgs e) { LoadDocument(this.ParentForm.TargetObject.Parent.Parent as Document, 1, 1, false, false, false); } This loads
