Good email etiquette: Sign Of A Digital Dictator Or A Lack Of Realisation? The best time to practice good email etiquette is when you're on a personal level with someone. Unfortunately, things like sending multiple emails, repeatedly contacting someone for the sake of it or checking messages you've already replied to start to take their toll on relationships. When it comes to sending proper, professional emails, etiquette still applies. In a training with the Mango Mail Marketing Team, email expert and founder of Greenford Email Marketing, David Lewis addressed a number of subjects that are worth exploring. Here's what he said: If you send one email a day and are in regular contact with clients, you can't send them a blank email every morning unless you're trying to rip someone off. Something must be pressing which means you're already in contact with them and no longer need to send them an email. You don't need to ring or text someone that you've already emailed to ask for more details. One email is enough if you're not asking for a business reply, more than one email with the same details can be considered poor email etiquette. If someone isn't responding to an email within 24 hours, send a reminder, if it's been more than 24 hours and they still haven't responded, it's time to move on. A three day gap between emails is usually an acceptable amount of time. You don't need to send a reminder every single time or multiple emails. "If you receive one email a month, then maybe send a reminder or keep the frequency of emails down to one email a week," David added. As you're sending, reading and responding to emails, make sure you're using the best practices for your email service or software. Use senders headers and use different addresses for different communications to reduce the risk of emails being filtered. Never send an email which has the phrase 'Love, Support, Suggestions, Thanks, Remind Me' in the subject line. No one likes being pestered and that's what these phrases mean to someone who doesn't know you personally and read too many of these emails.

Clients are also a bit annoyed when they receive emails

Despite the loss against England in the semi-final, Germany did not disappoint in their attempt to win in the other semi-final, as they defeated India to win the Asian Cup. As an homage to what the sport means to China, the Chinese national team played a 4-3-3 formation with three central midfielders, two wing backs, and two center forwards. The use of the formation was designed to play through the China-born legendary midfielder Wei Wei. The Chinese national team is just one of the Asian teams that are excited by the prospect of qualification for the 2018 FIFA World Cup. Japanese football idol, Shinji Kagawa, and English football genius, Gareth Southgate, both said that they would love to see Japanese football going up in the world of football. Substitute goals were scored by Japanese football legends, Sotetsu Tsuneyama and Honda Takayuki. In terms of the game, Chinese coach, Luiz Felipe Scolari, said that, while the game was close, it was not a test of physical prowess. "This was about politics. Of course there was a physical aspect to it, but I was surprised by the heat," said Scolari. "It was not a test of physical prowess," In regard to forward, Mario Gomez was the score-getter, scoring the lone goal for Germany. England fans are disappointed with the team, and
