Ihsahn says he still has a few tricks left up his sleeve Hailing from the Norwegian Black Metal scene and having just finished a lengthy North American tour, Ihsahn's latest album, Death Cult Armageddon, is full of big, swaggering and, at times, even breathy riffs as well as massive double-kick/double-bass breakdowns. It also has grandiose vocal performances ("Striking Fire") and some brief, stilted riffs ("Echelon") as well. But the band's live show is less about Baskervillian bouts of grand operatic theatrics and heavy percussion, and more about a humble, intimate, and, at times, even stripped-down, focused performance. Drummer Lincoln-J Håkansson even plays his kit without a kick pedal in places. If you're looking for the biggest dose of Norwegian Black Metal ever, the whole show is certainly the biggest dose you could ask for. But if you want Ihsahn and the band turning in a setlist that reflects the huge range of sounds that have been in the band's discography, you're going to have to look elsewhere. Heaven's Metal Hammer spoke to Ihsahn about the new album, the band's live show and his future plans. Heaven's Metal Hammer: To start with, I'm going to say that Death Cult Armageddon is my favourite Ihsahn record to date, given the tracklisting. Do you listen to the other albums, such as Eremita - a Pure Holocaust tribute album that came out in 2010 - and think "I would have done this differently"? Ihsahn: I listen to my old records all the time. I have a pair of earbuds from 10 years ago on my desk in my studio. "The Great Deceiver" is probably my favourite record. "The Origin of the Tyrant" and "Masquerade" are favourites as well. But that's just because they're from my first two albums, and I'm proud of both of them. But that said, I've been spending time with the new one, listening to it pretty much every day. So I'm sure there are songs from the other albums that are

Q: Testing a web service in IIS Express I'm trying to test a web service in IIS Express but it keeps giving me a connection timeout every time. I can debug and access the web service just fine and it works just fine from the browser, it's only from my testing environment that I have issues. I've set the property webhost.logging to true and that included an entry in the event log that states Event code: 3002 Event message: The operation has timed out Event time: 27/08/2010 11:27:29 Event time (UTC): 27/08/2010 10:27:29 Event ID: 706d34c8ac914424bb9d13e1f5406d80 Event sequence: 4 Event occurrence: 1 Event detail code: 0 and another statement from the same thread: HTTP GET localhost:50598/TestWebService.aspx/GetRates took 1815 ms to respond. I have tried setting the application pool's connection time out and the net.tcp protocol level time out properties, just in case it was timing out somehow, but still no luck. Any ideas on what I'm doing wrong? A: After some more research into this issue, I've managed to find the cause and resolution. I had my web service and web client application running as part of one solution but the projects were both inside of the same solution, meaning that they were both part of the solution's bin folder, and the problem was that Visual Studio sets a lot of cache values when you debug through Visual Studio which made the application timing out in IIS Express. Once I changed the web service project to be a separate (solution only) project, IIS Express worked as expected and so did the web service in the browser. A: I had this problem when I ran my project in Visual Studio 2010. I got the problem resolved on changing the "Use application pool identity for this site or service" to false. If you need this setting to false, you will have to open the application and open the application pool in IIS, find the application and select the property. A: The service is expecting a couple of things: An input from a client (so is the web-client). You have to
