Someone's finally built a working Spotify app for Echo. It's called EchoPod. EchoPod is like Echo for Spotify, but with a working app that lets you play music through your (connected) speakers as well as ring and play a song randomly. Alexa doesn't have Spotify — but now you can play music right through Echo using EchoPod. The app works on all Echo speakers and revs up with Spotify on the Echo Plus, also known as the second-gen Echo. (You can upgrade your existing Amazon Echo or borrow a friend's for free; the original Echo uses the Dot.) How do you know if you have the right Echo speaker? Look for the new release of Echo software on your phone app, or the update on Echo. EchoPod officially launched today at the Fortnite World Cup concert in Las Vegas, sponsored by Apple, Spotify, and Twitch. You'll have to trick out a speaker (or buy a new one) though. EchoPod hasn't yet been released on the Apple Store, Google Play Store, or even Amazon's Appstore for Echo. I imagine the app will arrive soon though, and be coming to the Amazon Appstore as well as the others soon. You can follow the developer's progress on their Instagram or GitHub. Snapchat's new proper app for Alexa is also due to finally release soon — but it's already been available on iOS for months. So what do you get with EchoPod (like Spotify)? Not a lot — only what you already know. When you first wake up Alexa, you have this lovely set up at the start: EchoPod
