Semiconductor die (also referred to herein as xe2x80x9cexotic dicexe2x80x9d) are typically packaged for mounting to a carrier substrate. The carrier substrate is then mounted to a motherboard or other circuit board, such as an adapter board. The carrier substrate includes a pair of conductive leads that allow the packaged die to be connected to the motherboard. The process of packaging the die typically includes placing the die on a platform and bonding the die to the platform. The platform typically includes a platform paddle, with the die being bonded to the bottom surface of the platform paddle. This type of platform is sometimes referred to as a xe2x80x9cdown-setxe2x80x9d platform. The bottom surface of the platform paddle typically includes a plurality of bumps formed thereon. The bumps allow the die to be affixed to the platform paddle. The platform paddle is bonded to the platform. The platform is then removed from the die. After the platform has been removed from the die, the die and the platform are encapsulated by molding (e.g., a thermosetting molding resin). The platform is then mounted to a motherboard using a die attach procedure. The die attach procedure typically includes placing the platform paddle with the die bonded thereto on the motherboard. The motherboard typically includes a plurality of leads that extend from the bottom of the motherboard. The leads may be formed on the same surface as the motherboard or on a second surface of the motherboard. The bottom surface of the platform paddle contacts the leads of the motherboard. In addition, a clamping pressure is applied to the platform paddle to hold the platform paddle in contact with the motherboard. The clamping pressure is applied using a die attach tool that applies a downward force to the
