It's a simple and fast icon chooser.PTH secreted from osteocytes and osteoblasts activates osteoclasts and induces osteolytic bone metastases. Bone metastases are caused by skeletal spread of cancerous cells that can be seen in breast, prostate, or lung cancers. Excessive osteoclastogenesis and the resulting osteolytic lesions are a prominent feature of skeletal metastases. Osteocytes, which are embedded in the calcified matrix of the bone, have been shown to release factors that can act on bone cell types, including osteoblasts. However, it is not clear whether factors released by osteocytes may also affect osteoclast-mediated bone resorption. Here, we demonstrate that PTH released from human osteocytes activates osteoclast precursors in vitro and induces osteolytic bone metastases in a mouse model of cancer-induced bone metastases. Osteocytes isolated from human trabecular bone and osteoblasts in cell culture were shown to release PTH-related protein (PTHrP) into the culture medium, and this PTHrP was able to activate the PTH/PTHrP receptor (PPR) on isolated osteoclast progenitor cells. In vivo, treatment with mouse PTH1-34, a PTHrP-derived peptide that acts through the mouse PPR, induced osteolytic bone metastases and raised intracellular calcium in bone marrow mononuclear cells (BMMs). In contrast, PTHrP deletion in osteocytes or inactivation of the PPR suppressed PTH-induced osteolysis. These studies demonstrate a previously unrecognized role of PTHrP from osteocytes and osteoblasts in regulating osteoclastogenesis and in promoting osteolytic bone metastases.While he spends the majority of his time honing his craft with The Cinemateers, Drew Morin also has an honest passion for games.
