[more...]Q: SortedQueue vs TreeMap I'm given the following situations One big array of data containing about 1000 pairs. I have to retrieve at random points of time all the data that have a given key. For each data, there is a "weight". A second big array containing only one sample of the 1000 pairs. I have to retrieve at a given point the same weight of samples data of the 1000 pairs. I need a way to retrieve just the data in the second array, because i'll be limited on memory. So I thought about using a SortedQueue to save all the data. But I'd like to know if I can instead use a TreeMap to save the data in order to get it faster and a little easier for the code to handle it. Thanks in advance, really need to know your views. A: If you must use a sorted queue to obtain data, a LinkedList would do the trick. It should be fast (linear in number of items), efficient (you only need one data structure), and amortized  $O(1)$ . To store the data, I would implement a "typical" list where you keep a reference to the next item (with a negative value if the list is empty), and the reference to the previous item (with a positive value if the list is empty). With Java 7 you can use index-based lists. Return
