Application programming interfaces (APIs) (also called development interfaces) are functions, routines and classes used by application programs, providing access to the functionality of an application (API) or a group of applications. In general, the developer of a given program will need to make such an API available to the program in order to be able to use the application effectively. This is often done by providing the application with source code. There are two main categories of APIs; Application programming interface (API): A set of routines, functions, or classes, used by software developers to create an application program.

Application programming specification (API): A set of programming language and library instructions needed to develop, distribute, install, test, and run an application. The particular terms for each type of API are application programming interface (API) and application programming specification (API). In the case of an API, the software developer may or may not make the API public, and where this happens is called the API being declared "public". This term is sometimes used to describe an API where the documentation is made available to the public, but without the source code. Some examples are Windows API and

Java SE API. Software developers make APIs available for their products by providing the source code for the API to either the public or a select group of users. Some APIs are public to the public and not downloadable. An API is generally provided as a source code file containing at least the header and library files, and sometimes the source code and executable files. The software developer will normally not provide source code for an API they are not willing to distribute, or that they wish to keep private for licensing purposes. The header file contains the name of the API and the file and line number where it was declared. It is included in other files, which use the API, or in the main file that uses it. An API normally contains a set of functions, routines, and classes that are provided by the API developer to the public. The term API is also applied to software libraries that provide access to a wide variety of programming functions and tools. Typically, the software developer will use a library's functions when they need to access, manipulate or use a particular programming language function or library. In this case, the library is not necessarily distributed, but is a file that a developer uses to access the functionality of the library or library components. Examples include the MS DOS API and the Java API.
