years oldThe quality of medical advice is something that is heavily debated in the medical community. Much like speech recognition technology is in development, the quality of medical advice is also still in development. And even if the quality is there in theory, it doesn't mean that the actual software can match the performance of human doctors. But that doesn't mean that other, less benevolent entities aren't taking advantage of this progression toward virtual doctors.

While your medical future may be safer with a skilled, intelligent healthcare provider, who knows what other entities may try to manipulate you, misguide you, and even trick you. For example, we are constantly hearing about, and subjected to, so-called 'disease risk calculators.' These "tools" estimate your risk of developing a certain disease. They are often promoted in conjunction with vague medical claims, such as 'vitamin E will cut your chance of heart disease by 15 percent.' Again, the truth is that these types of tools are unreliable, but they are nonetheless marketed as reliable. However, it's not only inaccurate medical advice that is peddled to us by the corporate community. Instead, the entire premise of these calculators is flawed, and will likely end up creating a society of unhealthy, unhealthy people. The corporations behind these calculators have chosen to promote an inaccurate and "healthful" perspective on the world. They have normalized the wrong side of the spectrum, which no doubt leads to the health problems that we see today. If we want to live in a society where we don't develop preventable illnesses, we must speak out against these calculators. These calculators exist because certain companies stand to gain a lot from an 'upbeat' health perspective. For instance, many of the leading "vitamin" companies provide compensation for doctors who emphasize the health risks associated with vitamin D deficiency.
