First of all – I have to thank NASA – the space agency behind the Kepler mission – and the K2 mission. Thanks to the K2 data scientists (especially Michael F. Brown, Joseph D. Howell, David H. Monet, Judith G. Schroeder, and Paul H. Schechter) who helped find this great new candidate to observe. Also – I want to thank all of the wonderful people who submitted follow-up observations and other valuable information. The data is overwhelming and it takes a lot of work to make it digestible, and I appreciate your efforts. The lightcurve for this object is shown on the right. There were many other objects found by the K2 data that look interesting, so I am not going to discuss them here. This object is certainly interesting, though. So what do we know? First, let’s look at the light curve – the top image and the stacked image on the bottom. The two red points are our data points. We see 4 peaks in the light curve, and it looks like a bit of a wobble between the two peaks. Even though the star is about a thousand times less massive than the Sun (the Sun is a G2V star), we can still use Kepler’s laws of motion to calculate the properties of this white dwarf. Using Kepler’s 3rd law (expressed in Astronomical 6d1f23a050
