The Federal Reserve's stunning economic data on Friday helped the U.S. stock market rise for a third straight session, surpassing a 7% gain for the first time since January. What's more, the Dow Jones Industrial Average and S&P 500 on Monday followed up that closing surge with impressive gains of more than 6%, underscoring a rally that's the best in years and certainly marks a sustained move to new highs. The rally is driven by a fundamental reason that's long been overlooked: The economy is simply getting better. While that may seem like a sign of good news, it's not necessarily a good thing. To be sure, hiring at large companies continues to be strong, benefiting most sectors of the economy. Companies are also boosting wages, which should lead to higher consumer spending and household incomes. But the benefits of an improving economy are often fleeting. That's because economic gains are often accompanied by rising inflation, which should result in higher interest rates and slower economic growth. As a result, the economy almost always appears more "hot" (and therefore better) the day after a strong job report. That's just natural economics. So with that being said, let's take a look at where we are now. A bull run in the making? Looking at the bigger picture, the economy isn't dead and buried. On Friday, the second-quarter gross domestic product (GDP) growth rate rose to 2.3%, as the economy added 196,000 nonfarm payroll jobs, according to the Bureau of Labor Statistics. That's right in line with the recent average. And while the job gains were modest, they clearly suggest that the economy is on the verge of running even better than average. And don't worry, this won't last. Not only does the economy need more growth, it also needs to achieve more stable growth. According to the San Francisco Federal Reserve, 6d1f23a050
