The stars may not be aligned quite the way you'd like, but you're sure in for a treat when you play Assassin's Creed IV: Black Flag. For many years, geologists have relied upon physical characteristics such as color, chemical composition, physical texture and the like to determine the relative location and origin of various materials found in unconsolidated or loosely consolidated sediments (i.e., soil, sand, gravel, pebbles, rock, etc.) such as is found in the oil and gas industry. These compositions and characteristics are commonly referred to as "indicators" that indicate the presence of subterranean material at different depths in a well bore. This information is used to determine the depth of the well bore in which the subterranean material may be located so that the material can be removed from the vicinity of the well bore and/or the subterranean material can be extracted. One common indicator is the presence of a dolomite in a formation of an oil-bearing subterranean formation. It has long been believed that dolomite is frequently encountered in hydrocarbon producing wells drilled into oil and gas bearing formations, and particularly in deep wells that are pumped through producing oil and gas reservoirs. Dolomite is a form of magnesium-calcium carbonate ($MgCO_3 \cdot Mg(OH)_2 \cdot CaCO_3$), often in the form of layers or in the shape of "pillars." Often the dolomite is found in crystalline layers or in the shape of discrete "pillars" extending perpendicular to the bedding plane (i.e., the orientation of the bedding of the formation). However, the presence of dolomite in a formation may not necessarily indicate the presence of another material, such as oil or gas. For instance, dolomite can be found in oil and gas wells drilled into subterranean
