Updated 8/27/15 .A novel assay to detect anti-HLA-class I or II antibodies in complement-dependent cytotoxicity and flow crossmatch. The complement-dependent cytotoxic crossmatch (CDCXM) is a common test in transplantation. We investigated the relationship between anti-HLA-class II (anti-DR) antibodies and CDCXM, and its utility to predict graft outcome. The CDCXM was performed by testing donor against recipient serum in complement, and was classified as negative (N), positive or doubtful (D). NCDCXM was further classified into N-D and DCDCXM as anti-HLA-class I (anti-A, B, or C) or anti-HLA-class II antibodies. The incidence of CDCXM against recipient serum was evaluated in patients with or without chronic rejection and a correlation between the CDCXM and graft function was investigated. The incidence of CDCXM in 105 patients was 4.8%, and that of DCDCXM was 0%. The rate of chronic rejection in CDCXM-positive was significantly higher than that of CDCXM-negative. NCDCXM was detected in 10 (9.5%) patients, and the graft survival was significantly worse in the NCDCXM-positive group. The rate of CDCXM, especially NCDCXM, was significantly higher in group C compared with group A. However, there was no significant correlation between the CDCXM and graft function. The present data suggest that the CDCXM is a reliable test and that the donor-specific antibody is the main cause of the CDCXM. However, the NCDCXM was not associated with graft function, and the anti-HLA-class II antibody is less important than the anti-
