A female superiority in rTMS on depressive symptoms has been demonstrated, possibly caused by an interaction between a lower level of current depression and estrogen \[@CR32]\]. Other studies suggest that the potential of rTMS to induce the HPA axis response may be lower in women, independent of the lower level of current depression \[@CR16], \[@CR33]\]. The predictive value of plasma cortisol levels for the antidepressant effect of rTMS is not known, although higher levels of serum cortisol predict the antidepressant effect of ECT \[[@CR17]\]. However, no gender difference in cortisol levels after antidepressant treatment in bipolar disorders has been reported \[[@CR34], [@CR35]\]. The present study has several strengths. It is an randomized, double-blind study with a rather large sample size, using ECT as a reference treatment. It may be one of the larger studies to examine the role of individual differences in cortisol reactivity in the antidepressant treatment response to ECT. However, the study also has limitations. First, the study was not based on a parallel design. Consequently, there were several treatment variations, although standardized clinical procedures and standard trial procedures were used and such variations might have had an effect on the c6a93da74d
